

No one can become self realized. The process of spiritual evolutions come not from within, but from without. At the limits of perception there is still self. That self is the will-o-the-wisp that always lies out of reach, out of control and undesirable.

Full self realisation is not a sustainable state, one may grow to realise his fealty to all, yet one must also still know that he is individual. Therefore the distaste of unsavoury paltryness is very laudable.
